

If you stated that your income would be a certain amount, and then you received premium assistance based on that amount, but your income turned out to be lower than you stated, you may have been entitled to more premium assistance than you received, and you will receive the balance as a tax credit when you file your tax return. If your income turned out to be higher than you projected, then you likely received too much premium assistance. If so, you will have to pay back the difference at tax time, up to a certain limit.

The table below shows the repayment limits.

Household income percentage of federal poverty level (FPL)	Limit on repayment amount — single person	Limit on repayment amount — family
Less than 200 percent of FPL	$300	$600
At least 200 percent of FPL but less than 300 percent of FPL	$750	$1,500
At least 300 percent of FPL but less than 400 percent of FPL	$1,250	$2,500
Greater than 400 percent of FPL (i.e., the person was not eligible for premium assistance)	All premium assistance received	All premium assistance received
